THE OPINION OF A CRIMINAL

Edward Wiler Dunlap, at one time a Princeton graduate, and subsequently one of the most notorious criminals that have ever flourished in America has written a book. The literary labor was carried out in the penitentiary and it has now been published after the authors death. As a human document it will certainly take a high rank. A great many disquisitions upon criminality have been given to the world at one time and another, but they nearly all of them have the disadvantage of being studies from the outside. Here at last we have criminality as viewed by the educated and intelligent criminal and if his opinions are unorthodox it is only what we might expect.

Dunlap's specialty was burglary, although his patronage was also extended to many other branches of crime. He is therefore competent to deal with his subject, and while he does not enter upon any futile defense of crime in general he stoutly maintains that its recognized branches, in which he himself was so great an adept, are far less immoral and far less hurtful to the community than what he calls the moral crime to which no legal penalties have yet been attached. He says that moral crime is usually enterprise and genius, while the crimes that are punished by the penitentiary are simply a convenient selection from the far larger body of misdeeds that now plague the public, and that their selection is made entirely without reference to moral obliquity. Where he asks, is the difference between the wealthy corporations that is willing to sell its goods at a loss in order to run a small competitor and the highwayman whose coercive measures take the more concrete but not more effective form of a revolver? Mr. Dunlap tells us that there is indeed a difference and that it lies in the fact that the corporations method may ruin thousands and requires no personal courage while the highwayman despoils one person only, and at great personal risk to himself.

Mr. Dunlap shows a great knowledge of finance and he uses it for the dissection of some of the money princes of the day. His ultimate conclusion is that there is a bond of union between such as himself and many of the great financiers and that they form one common family of thieves. At the same time he pays the homage that their greatness demands from those who imitate them at a distance, and who do upon the smallest scale what their models do upon the largest.
